I would like to log to a networked server. I know I can easily use NLog or log4net, but I would like to log from a Java application. I know that NLog or log4net, have the ability to listen to a TCP server. Does anyone know of a java logging library which has such an ability? I would like to use log4j, but I would like to configure everything from eclipse. Thanks. A: You can write your own logging framework and configure it to use a socket server. There's an excellent book on how to build a lightweight logging framework. A: As promised I'm adding a JVM-based logging solution. It's called JLog. It is JVM based. It runs as a plugin with support for all major Java platforms. All loggers in the project are kept in the same place, no class loading overhead. It uses NIO for transferring logs to the socket server. The most obvious use case is for service hosting. Permit me to introduce myself as a fellow Pet Owner. My kids are the same age and I've found the excitement you guys bring to your dogs brings a lot of joy to my kids too. My two boys love the pets. We all live in north central Washington State. We have a Maltese named "Romy" who is the size of a bread box. She is a rock. She's been with us since we had our first son, James, when he was 11 months old. She's taught us so much, about the joy of being a pet parent. James calls her "Mommy" and we enjoy the company of "Mommy's Boy". My wife and I like the constant companionship we have with a dog who needs to be taken outside a lot and also an insomniac dog who needs to be walked twice a day. I can never take Romy to any other place 2d92ce491b
