Photograph by Colin McPherson/Corbis The two boys in these images are most likely Frank McPherson and Robert Phillips. When he was eight and she was seven, they left the town of Lumberton, North Carolina, for New York City, but, owing to a legal issue, they were never legally adopted there. So the McPherson family stayed in the only home they'd ever known. (Frank and Robert's mother, whose name was Angela Scott, died in 1997.) In their childhood, the kids' favorite pastimes were drawing—their mother made them use crayons—and playing with balls, which they found in trash cans in the neighborhood. Their mother once told them to leave the door open for someone they'd never met; they did, and when the person, Angela Scott's cousin, walked in, she told them she loved them. The children were used to having people love them, but Angela Scott didn't know about the orphanage, where they'd lived until they were eight and she was seven. The children live with their widowed grandmother, because their mother died in 1997, and they live with their widowed aunt, because their mother's parents died while she was pregnant with them. They're nice kids, usually. They can be loud, so other kids don't like them. They can be mean, so other kids don't like 2d92ce491b
