Protect The Rights Of The Underrepresented Archives Most right to work states face restrictions from mandatory union dues, but 11 of them also stand to have their memberships investigated and possibly revoked if they have not made any substantial progress toward union recognition by 2011. In addition to Michigan, there are nine other states up for the chance to gain access to this enforcement authority. Wisconsin, Indiana, and Kentucky are all on the list, as are Minnesota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas, and West Virginia. Such enforcement practices are usually used after a union has failed to get a majority of workers to sign up after a certain amount of time or after all of the union's bargaining objectives are met. In recent years, the primary reason cited by law enforcement has been the failure to get approval to conduct an election. In cases where unions have been suspected of unlawfully obtaining dues, the amounts involved have been substantial. In one case, the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) fined a local union $13 million for extracting dues from non-members. In another case, a union and local chapter had an agreement with a local bank to force workers to give union dues in exchange for a discount on interest payments on mortgage loans. Law enforcement officials say that if they aren't given the authority to pursue such cases, they won't even bother. "I think it's just a waste of law enforcement's time," says Bob Fitzsimmons, an officer with the Pennsylvania State Police, the agency charged with investigating the state's Right-To-Work legislation. "[The union] gets what they want. It doesn't matter what you do; they just leave." "We just don't want it to be used as f3e1b3768c
