A variety of methods and systems have been developed to determine fluid flow within a body lumen. For example, fluid flow within a blood vessel can be determined by recording a pressure on a pressure transducer placed at the interior of the vessel. The fluid flow rate in the vessel can then be estimated by multiplying the vessel cross-sectional area by the time differential between the pressures recorded at the exterior and interior of the vessel. The velocity of the fluid flow is proportional to the rate of pressure change in the vessel measured over a short period of time. Pressure measurements may also be used to determine an average velocity at which the fluid moves through the vessel. While these methods have proven useful, they are time consuming to utilize and are prone to error in situations where the fluid flow is turbulent. Some effort has been made to determine the flow of fluids within a body lumen by measuring the velocity of a marker placed on the surface of the fluid. For example, techniques have been developed wherein a Doppler-type ultrasonic transducer is secured to the skin of a patient and used to detect the movement of a motionless object such as a saline filled bag. In such applications, the flow of the fluid within a body lumen can be estimated by determining the Doppler shift of an emitted ultrasound wave. However, the use of an in-patient Doppler transducer has severe limitations, since it is often difficult to obtain patient consent and the device takes up considerable room. A technique to measure the flow of fluids through a body lumen is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 4,305,135 to Choy et al. in which a catheter is used to radially stretch
