Like most commercial CAD applications, AutoCAD is based on a database-driven workflow, in which users create and modify plans or drawings that are ultimately saved to the database as standard.DWG files. In AutoCAD, all drawings are stored in.dwg (drawing) files, which contain data about the shape of the drawing. AutoCAD also creates.dwgx (xref) files that contain data about the position and visibility of objects. Drawing files are constructed of a series of drawing elements such as lines, arcs, circles, squares, text, and fills. Together, these elements create a drawing or plan. When a drawing is modified, the drawing elements are also modified. Some drawing elements can be deleted or moved, while others can be created, merged, split, and copied. Although AutoCAD is designed primarily as a drafting tool, it has many features that are used for planning, organizing, and detailing many different types of drawings, from plans to architectural design. I need to access table without indexes so I can insert huge amount of data into this table. I have 70000*10=70K of records with no indexes and I need to insert them. I created dump file with 70000 rows to this table. The problem is that table takes more than 3 minutes to be unlocked even with simple string as unique key. My question is: Is there any way to speed up this process? Or maybe is there any way to dump data into the table so it will be unlocked faster? A: No there is no faster way than how you did it. If you are really concerned about this, you could create a temporary table and dump the data to it, delete the original table, and then rename the temporary table to the name of the original. This will be quicker than the dump, but will still be slower than the dump. A: Is there any way to speed up this process? I would say no. If I were you I'd throw my hands up and do what you said: dump the data and create the table using the dumped data. If you're desperate, then you can always try recompiling the server and see what happens. But it's worth trying other things first. A: You could always create an empty index.
